

Job Ch 13 Men's Bible Study by Rick Burgess

In Job chapter 13, Job rebukes his friends for their false counsel, calling them "worthless physicians" and demanding silence so he can speak directly to God. Despite his terror and pain, he affirms his integrity and expresses a profound, unwavering trust in God, famously stating, "Though he slay me, yet will I hope in him". He then pleads with God to reveal his sin, withdraw his hand of judgment, and stop hiding his face from him.

Key points from Job 13

- Rebukes his friends:

Job calls his friends "worthless physicians" who are speaking falsely about God and misrepresenting his situation. He says their words are like "proverbs of ashes" and dismisses their advice as empty. He wants them to be silent and not to speak deceitfully on God's behalf.

- Expresses his determination to speak to God:

Job states that he will argue his case directly with God, even if it leads to his death. He believes his vindication is certain and that a hypocrite cannot come before God.

- Appeals directly to God:

Job then turns his attention to God, begging Him to withdraw his hand of judgment and stop terrifying him. He asks God to show him his sin and asks why God considers him an enemy.

- Maintains his innocence:

Throughout the chapter, Job maintains his uprightness and asks God to point out his transgressions, while also describing how he feels God is dealing with him harshly.
